Basic Search

Searching > Basic Search

Search Subject Areas

Enter one or more words and click Search.
Enjoy looking through your search results. Open and view documents that interest you. A document can be anything from a newspaper article, to a photograph, to a PDF, to a video.

Things to know

What ProQuest is doing with the words you entered:
ProQuest looks for your words (search terms) in the following document information:

- document titles
- authors
- abstract
- subjects
- full text
- tags (user-generated tags)

If you enter more than one word, eternal love for example, ProQuest will look for documents that contain both eternal and love in any of the document information listed above.

Search for an exact phrase

Surround your words with quotation marks—"eternal love" or "life after death"—to force ProQuest to look for your words as a phrase only, rather than finding each word separately.

Find out what databases you're searching

Information about what databases you are currently searching is displayed in the center of the blue bar at the top of the ProQuest window. Here's an example of how it looks:

You are searching: 81 databases (See list | Change >>)
Use the links to view the current list and select or deselect databases.

Limit your search

- Select the Full text checkbox to find only documents that provide the complete full text, versus just a citation or abstract.
- Select the Scholarly journals checkbox to find only documents from academically oriented journals.

Search term suggestions as you enter your search (often called autocomplete)

As you type in the search box, you'll notice that a list of terms - always based on what you've typed at any point - begins to display beneath the box. These terms are in a dictionary built from previous successful searches by all users. Click a term in the list to search on it immediately.

Andrew Liegel, Senior Analyst, Risk Management, Financial Insights.
Bank Systems & Technology 44.2 (Feb 2007): 23.

☐ Citation/Abstract ☐ Full text

Abstract (summary)
As the tug of war between hedge funds and traditional asset managers over institutional assets increases and alternative asset managers wrangle with the risk management function in banking, the risk management role has been put under scrutiny like never before. To start evaluating a risk management structure, financial institutions need to decide where the risk officer (or equivalent) should reside. Banks also need to decide what technologies are appropriate to support the risk management team.
